Tonight, we took Barry and Larry Lowman to dinner at the Bistro Ratafia, 18 Boulevard St. Germain. Previously, we attended a large, gay cocktail party at the Lyons'.

The decision by Great Britain to join the Common Market, if certain derogations from the Rome Treaty are agreed, is one of the historical events of our century. It would also, in time, lead to the inclusion of the U.K. in the Coal and Steel Community and in Euratom. I may yet live to see the U.S. and Canada linked with this great European complex in bonds so strong as to create lasting Western unity, with all that would connote for the preservation of Western civilization against aggression from elsewhere.

Bought a bronze bust of Louis XV from Samy Chalom. Read telegrams at the Embassy. Saw friends. Lunched with E. and Marie Louise. We took off from Le Bourget at 4 p.m. with Jim Penfield, who is staying with us until he goes back to Iceland. A smooth crossing. I went immediately from the airport to see Lord Home at the Foreign Office. He invited me to shoot at his place in Scotland.

The Jones and Jim Penfield dined with us. The boys are back after a blissful stay with Polly Wisner in Peebleshire; according to David, everything there was "neat". Sasha is staying on with Wendy for another week. David says she is bow-legged from riding.
